As tourism related activities have grown and changed, many different definitions and ways of classifying the industry have emerged. Use of the termhas evolved as attempts have been made to place a title on a difficult to define group of naturally relatedactivities and participants. It is helpful to begin with a common definition that has been accepted for decades: the temporary.....of people tooutside their normal places of work and, the activities undertaken during their stay in those destinations, and the created to cater to their needs. As our definition shows, tourism includes a wide array of people,, and facilities. Although tourism is not a distinctly identified industry, most people would agree that it is a unique grouping of industries that are tied together by a common denominator – the Individual tourists may deal directly with any of these tourism service, but they often rely on the professional services provided by tourismsuch as travel agencies and touristthat provide information and other marketing services. They provide these services independently, they may compete with each other, and, at times, they may work together. For example, airline, bus, railroad,, and car rental companies may compete individually for a traveler's business. However, they may also team up to provide cooperativesuch as fly-ride, fly-cruise, and fly- drive alternatives. Or as airlines have discovered, they must establish strategic alliances with many other carriers to provide seamless travel across states, nations, and continents. Hotels and resorts may also compete against each other for the same’s patronage, yet cooperate with transportationto attract tourists to a specific location. Service providers representing all segments of the tourism industry may often work together to developpackages designed to attract tourists to destinations.
